Trapped Trappers

Outside of Fort Wallington a tall guant man was talking to two soldiers. His face was browned by twenty years exposure to the extreme climate of the mountains. His long black hair, as yet scarcely tinged with gray, hung almost to his shoulders. His cheeks and chin were clean shaven, after the fashion of the mountain men. His dress was the usual hunting frock of buckskin, with long fringes down the seams, with pantaloons similarly ornamented, and moccasins of Indian make. From his belt dangled a sheath that held a razor edged hunting knife made from an old file. Jed Simpson had made the long trip alone to the fort.

"The greatest man out here in the West; and mind you, that takes in a lot of territory," he was boasting to the two soldiers, "is Colonel John Raven. You agree with me?"

One of the soldiers couldn't resist smiling at that statement.

"If it's a quarrel or a fight you would like to pick with us, then talk about something else. In the territory around Fort Wallington they say even the animals agree to that statement. And so do we. There isn't a soldier in the fort that wouldn't welcome the chance to go with the colonel on any of his various expeditions. Something tells me the colonel is expecting you. So go right ahead into the fort."

The mountain man walked passed the gate into the fort. He stopped in front of Charles Collins, known as Chubby Collins, who is the best friend and companion of Colonel John Raven.

"My eyes are still keen," greeted the mountain man. "And you are still getting rounder and younger. How have things been with you the past year?"

"As long as I still own my scalp then things are satisfactory," replied Chubby. "The general is talking with Colonel Raven about your complaint. Just wait here for a few minutes."

Seated at his desk, was General Henderson, in charge of the fort and surrounding territory. In front of him stood the most famous frontiersman of the day, Colonel John Raven. He was definitely a big man. He was six feet three inches from his moccasined feet to his tight fitting leather cap. He was all muscle and weighed a little more than two hundred and thirty pounds. His cheek bones were high. The sun and the wind had tanned his skin. On his leather coat was the emblem by which Colonel John Raven was famous on the frontier of growing America; the black bird which had come to symbolize the man who was opening the wilderness and making it possible for people to move Westward in safety.

"Every man in America is entitled to justice and the protection of his person and property," said the General. "We have a very large territory to protect and a relatively small number of soldiers to see that peace is kept. I need not tell you that it is no easy matter to restrain the redskins from going on the warpath. That is where all our energy must be centered. On the other hand, when a thief like Pierre Montaigne starts stealing from the traps of the redskins, as well as the mountain men, we must take time to see that he is punished. I understand your old friend, Jed Simpson, suffered at the hands of this thief who raids the traps."

"That is correct, General," replied Colonel Raven. "Not only did this Pierre Montaigne steal the beavers that were caught in the traps, but also the furs that had been secretly cached in the ground. Chief Ta moo-tahni says that his braves almost caught Montaigne raiding their traps. I suggested to Jed Simpson and the Chief that we go trapping, not for beaver, but for a thief. If my suggestions have been followed, we should get this criminal. May I have about two weeks leave from the fort, sir?"

"Permission granted," said the general. "I am certain that this Pierre, if he remains alive, will be a better and wiser man after his contact with you. Success to your mission. Take any supplies you may need."

Colonel John Raven left the general's quarters and went outside. There he saw his two friends talking together.

"Why are you two wasting words," he chided. "When you both could be getting supplies ready. We leave as soon as you get the pack horses ready, Chubby. Go to Sergeant McMullins and draw two weeks rations. We are going to visit the traps."

Pierre Montaigne and his brother, Jean LaSalle, were both on the ground. They were watching the beavers that had been caught in Jed Simpson's traps.

"Mon ami," said Pierre with joy in his voice, "the work is done for us. When we're finished we will look for the rest of the furs that must be cached in the ground."

Pierre Montaigne was unaware that up in the trees, his every motion was being watched by the keen eyes of two of the braves from Chief Ta-moo-tahni's tribe.

"I could fit an arrow to my bow and send the man to the happy hunting grounds while you do the same to his partner," whispered one of the braves.

"We promised not to kill," replied the other. "And that promise must be kept. Their punishment shall start when they fall into the trap."

Jean LaSalle quickly killed the trapped beavers and then he skinned them. He made a pile of their furs on the ground.

"Here must be where the other furs are hidden," shouted Montaigne. "Come help me remove the earth."

Jean LaSalle walked over to his companion and then suddenly it happened! The earth gave way and both men fell down into a pit that had been dug and cleverly concealed.

"The thieving trappers are trapped," remarked one of the braves. "Now we must do our part. We slide down this tree, and we feed them and give them water, until Colonel Raven arrives."

For five days the two trapped thieves remained in the pit. Unseen hands supplied them with water and food. Both men were scared.

"Perhaps they will keep us here forever until we die," suggested Jean LaSalle.

"I shall lose my mind if I don't get out of here," screamed Pierre Montaigne.

On the sixth day, the three men travelling from Fort Wallington arrived at the spot. One brave merely pointed to the ground.

"They are there, Colonel Raven. What shall we do with them?"

"Bring them out and tie them up securely. We are going to visit Chief Ta-moo-tahni and give them to him as a gift."

Those words were deliberately spoken loudly so as to reach the ears of the two trapped men and cause them to have more cause for worry. It was quite effective. During the two day trip to the Indian camp, the two captives pleaded for their lives.

"They will burn us alive," shrieked Jean LaSalle.

"They will shoot arrows into us," shouted Pierre Montaigne.

There was great celebration and joy in the Indian camp when the men arrived.

"My white brother has kept his word," exclaimed the Chief. "You caught the thieves for us. We shall punish them."

The two bound trappers watched the Indians throw branches on an ever growing fire.

"You can't let them do that to us," screamed Montaigne. "Have pity on us. Let us live!"

"That could be arranged," replied Colonel Raven. "According to the custom of this tribe, a thief when caught spends his time here as a slave. He must produce goods three times the value of that which was stolen. Is that agreeable to you two?"

"Cut the inside of my coat," said Pierre Montaigne. "You will find a draft on the banking house of Donnelly & Sons, in St. Louis. I sold all the furs I had stolen. That represents what I received for them. Divide it among the Indians and Jed Simpson. But let me get out of here."

The draft was found in a secret lining of the coat. Colonel Raven explained the situation to the chief and Jed Simpson. It was satisfactory.

"I know, you will take him to the fort and turn him over to the general," said the chief. "But one thing I do not understand?"

"What is that?" asked Colonel John Raven.

"Why were those two so frightened when we made a big fire to cook meat for our guests? Do they think we are savages?"
